Choosing a Secondary School for your child

Choosing a School for your child with Special Educational Needs

We recommend that before you visit any school you have thought about what questions you want answers to. This checklist contains most of the more obvious and general points. You might want to refer back to these once you have visited several different schools, so keep a checklist for each school that you visit. Throughout this booklet there is space to make notes and enter any particular questions that are important to you but which are not covered elsewhere.

Parents of children with special needs are no different to any other parents when it comes to choosing the right school, all though you may need to visit several schools before you find a school that you feel will meet your child's individual Special Educational Needs before making your final choice. Look for an environment where your child is most likely to thrive – where they will feel happy and secure at school and benefit from the kind of teaching that enables them to develop, learn and meet their potential.

It is important to involve your child when making this important decision. Get your child's views too; tell them what you are doing and why. Included inside is a section is for you and your child to complete, either together or independently. The questions here will help you to talk to your child about their feelings and wishes.

THINGS THAT YOU MAY BE ASKED FOR:

- A copy of your child's statement / EHC plan
- What level of support have they had in the past?
- Which agencies are already involved with your child?
- Your child's current attainment (e.g National curriculum levels)

Your Notes:

Young Persons view

Sometimes it will be appropriate for parents to visit schools before the child does, especially if there are lots of choices and different types of schools that need to be considered. Transition to secondary school can be an anxious time for any child; it would be especially confusing if you took your child to too many schools. Parents may wish to shortlist just a couple of possible options before they organise for the child to visit. Visiting too many schools may be overwhelming for some children. Limiting the number of different schools that are visited can reduce anxiety.

A Parent's Story

In a perfect world I would have wanted my twin boys to be in the same school, but they have very different needs.

Bobby has high-functioning autism and is academically quite gifted. We knew he'd fit into mainstream but we were looking for a small and nurturing place and we needed them to be flexible with Bobby and understand his difficulties.

The school we chose has been brilliant. They prepared a thorough transition plan before he started, made a visual timeline to help him to navigate the day's routine and have very gradually introduced him to every aspect of school life. His learning support assistant knows what he can and can't cope with, and has helped to push him to make the most of his academic skills while also working on his social skills.

Bobby's twin, Alec, has complex learning difficulties as well as autism. I knew he would be perfectly well behaved in a mainstream school, but that it would all go straight over his head. He needed very specific teaching methods to help him focus. Classes at the special school we chose for him are very small (about eight children with one teacher and about four assistants). He started in a class that taught him using sensory techniques and has now moved to an autism class where he has speech therapy every week. Alec has made tremendous progress and is really happy.

You can't go by what the rest of the world thinks and you can't go by what you'd hope for if things were different. You have to make a judgement based on your child's welfare in the here and now. I always did bear in mind that I could change schools if they weren't suitable, but both have been ideal.

Debby, from Stockport (mother of seven-year-old twins Bobby and Alec, who have autism)
