What is the English sector all about?

For almost all employers, employees who have a good standard of written and spoken English is seen as a vital characteristic of, and requirement for, their workforce.

A workforce that contains Individuals who possess a good standard of English will clearly boost productivity levels within the economy. However, increasing the standard of English in the workplace will also have wider benefits for individuals and their organisation, including:

- Improved levels of communication- with more effective time and process management;
- Increased confidence levels and an improved ability to work as part of a team; and
- Ultimately, it can also improve the service provided to customers (internal and external) and thus improve the way customers, clients and other members of the organisation view individuals and their organisation.

Will there be opportunities and where are they?

English is often regarded as the international language of business as well as being prominent in the global digital and technical world in which we live. Whilst having as many people in the workplace as possible who have a good standard of English is important, some jobs will demand a broader and deeper knowledge of the subject more than others and will require a higher degree of specialisation.

In addition to job roles where English Language and English Literature skills and qualifications dominate, there are many job role areas where English skills and qualifications would be useful; these include: Academic Librarian (especially within a Higher Education Institution); Advertising copywriter; Education consultancy; Private Education Tutor; and Social Media Manager.

Across the Liverpool City Region, English skills and qualifications of local residents are behind the national average and many employers struggle to fill job vacancies because applicants lack the skills required to perform the job role effectively. A number of solutions to address these issues will be implemented not least in the area of teaching - where innovative approaches to the recruitment and retention of teaching staff will promote teaching as a quality and satisfying career option.
